(EDITORIAL.)

That triumphant day, the 8th of January, recalls to our memories, feelings as truly glorious are they justly dear to every Louisianian. The anniversary of that memorable day has ever been celebrated by the martial parade of our citizens, proudly joyous to rally around those colours under which they so successfully defended the country's honour, but on Tuesday last, a still more urgent motive, the presence of him who led them to victory, seemed particularly conducive to a more general parade than usually takes place on similar occasions. Their warlike appearance and tactical movements made them the worthy rivals of their Natchez compatriots; a certain number of whom escorted the General to this city. To see all those freemen armed in defence of their country and its institutions was really a noble and interesting spectacle. But if the martial ardour of our citizens to fill the ranks of their respective corps was pleasing to our sight, the careless disregard of the citizens generally, was equally painful, and was totally different from what expectation had formed of the joy to be evinced.
Some few far-distant groups did not seem accordant with that joyous welcome we expected to see, and we could not withhold remarking the difference between that and a similar occasion still fresh in our recollection. Assured as we were that Louisianians have never been unmindful of that gratitude they owe and must ever owe to the defender of their soil; we observed with regret the venerable warrior walking unheeded through the silent ranks of those persons whom curiosity had drawn together. We did not see without painful emotion that respectable veteran during the course of a fatiguing march depending for support on the arms of two distinguished citizens, and we sincerely wished that he had made his entry on horse-back, as had been previously announced; he would then have been more satisfactorily seen by those who were desirous to gaze to the face of him who so eminently contributed to the glorious expulsion of the proud invaders of our country.
Whatever may have existed, we would have wished for some more striking evidence of public gratitude; for although nothing was omitted that could honour the Hero of the State; his heart which has already sympathyzed with the hearts of Louisianians, would in that case have been now in doubtful with regard to any thing that concerns a heart ... appreciation of public welcome, indeed ... even possible that at the time painful feelings may have found their way to his heart.
However, if we examine into the cause of so cold a reception, it will be easy to perceive that it originated in nothing like ingratitude; but really from the delicate position in which were placed the greater part of our citizens ... ing.
