The verbal proceedings of the last sitting was read.—A letter from the Mayor was read.—He proposed changing the manner of farming out the privilege of selling oysters, the present method being a bad one, as it gives to different persons the power of imposing their [illegible] on the public. He was of opinion that the entire privilege should be given to one or to several persons.

He informed the Council that [illegible] negroes condemned to hard labour, remained in the prison from the want of chains to secure them when at work in the streets. He proposed making an appropriation for the purchase of such chains.

A proposition was made by [illegible] Rose, who offered [illegible] privileges on certain conditions.

A letter was read from Mr. Labbé, who informed the Council of [illegible] frame buildings now erecting in [illegible] contrarity to the existing regulations, and particularly of the frame erecting on the property of Mde. FROM ENGLAND.

The packet ship Amethyst, at Boston brought Liverpool papers of the 21st, and London of the morning of 20th ult. They contain no latter intelligence from the Continent, than has reached us by way of France.

Extract of a letter from Liverpool, April 21.

"Our Cotton Market looks well; and there is more disposition to speculate than for a long time.—Much depends upon the supplies from your side, indeed every thing: 150,000 distribution ought, at least, to keep our market steady; but many are expecting a deficience of 200,000 bales. We are disposed to think that the consumption this year will exceed the last, even if our prices improve a little more. It was not until the second week of May, last year, that the very heavy supplies from the United States began to arrive.—Therefore after the middle of next month, any deficiencies of import will be more apparent than it now is. No political news of moment."

A postcript to another letter of the 21st says—"There has been a good inquiry for cotton to day, and the sales may probably amount to 3000 bags, at the full prices of Saturday."

On the 19th an express arrived in London from Paris, whose intelligence did not transpire that day.

It was said that the ship Eyre had arrived in England from Lisbon, with despatches to April 8; but nothing had been published.

A petition has been presented in the British Parliament against the [illegible] of Lead.

100 Journeymen Weavers have petitioned that a rate of wages [illegible] be fixed by law, below which employers shall not be allowed to go in their pay.

A call has been made for a return of the Slave Population of the Colonies. The Anti-Slavery Society of Liverpool has petitioned. It wishes Sugar from slave labor not to be encouraged. It states that the slaves in the Colonies have diminished 28,000

The Scotch Surgeons have petitioned for some legislative enactment by which they may be able to obtain subjects for dissection.

The people of New South Wales have petitioned for a Legislature, equal representation and trial by jury. They state their number at 55,000—35,000 free English. The residue convicts. Government returns give the Br. population at 49,000—only [illegible] free.—It was remarked in Parliament that party spirit raged, owing to the number of persons of education among the convicts, and that such should not be sent out.

The Principles of a Sinking Fund.

Among the remarkable publications of the day in London, is an essay by Lord Grenville, clarum et venerabile nomen, on the efficacy of the Sinking Fund. In this essay, the noble lord frankly admits, that his views and opinions in relation to such a fund have undergone entire change, and that he now distrusts, as much as he formerly believed in the advantage thereof. Much attention appears to be excited in London by this publication, of which, for the purpose of explaining the object of the work, and of giving place to just sentiments well expressed, of the true nature of consistency in a public man, we present the introductory address:

[N. Y. American.

Introduction.—"When politicians tell us of the unvaried, uniformity of their opinions and conduct, one is tempted sometimes to ask by what supernatural power they were gifted in their cradle with infallibility. To fallible men [illegible] should be the praise of having retained through life, on the most important subjects, a judgment, unimproved by cultivation or exercise, untaught by experience, and of every advance in science utterly regardless. Far more estimable in themselves, and immeasurably more beneficial to mankind, are those qualities which lead men conversant in government and legislation both to the ready abandonment of error, and to its undisguised avowal.

"Such is the justification, if any justification can be requisite, of the total change of sentiment which is expressed in the following essay. Few measures have been more largely applauded than the Act of Parliament which established, in 1786, a sinking fund for the reduction of our national debt. The writer of these pages was himself a party to the too sanguine hopes of those who framed and proposed that law; confidently believing it one of the greatest services which could then be rendered to their country. To that opinion he long adhered; and even now, after the lapse of more than forty years he feels it still painful to renounce so flattering a persuasion. But the interests of truth and science are paramount to all such considerations; and he who was formerly among the warmest advocates of a sinking fund, is, on this account, the more strongly bound [illegible] now on every fit occasion, the distrust which he now entertains of its efficacy and real benefit. This is the true consistency of public duty.

"Such an occasion now presents itself. After repeated changes made in the Act of 1786, the State has been once more driven avowedly to support its Sinking Fund by borrowing; a policy which is, in fact, though not in name, a virtual [illegible] of the whole system; and Parliament, opened by fresh [illegible] and [illegible] expected [illegible] definitively on the re-establishment [illegible] or abandonment of that important measure. Under these circumstances some advantage may possibly be derived from an attempt, however imperfect, to examine separately such of its [illegible] grounds, the most prominent among the many topics which that deliberation must embrace."

A Duellist Justice.—The regiment of foot was quartered at Vellore when the tragical event took place which deprived poor Captain Bull of his existence. He was a very early man of—beloved by [illegible] knew him, and much respected in the Hussar regiment, which he quitted to [illegible] exchange, for a company in the regiment in India, which he had joined only a few months. At Vellore, he found a mess of officers, chiefly Irish, and by no means favorable specimens of that Country, either in its virtues or of its failings. He felt, therefore, as was natural, little or no inclination to associate with them, further than military duty required. The mess of the regiment was convivial and expensive; and Captain Bull having been [illegible] to a young lady who was going to India, had the strongest and most [illegible] able proofs for living economically. He therefore intimated, but [illegible] of politeness, his disinclination to join the mess, stating his expectations of being shortly married, and the consequent increase of expense which he was soon to incur. But the majority of the mess the Irish part of it in particular, with the confusion of head incident to those who are resolved to quarrel, interpreted his refusal into a personal affront. It was then unanimously agreed amongst nine officers present, that they should draw lot, which of them was to call Captain Bull out. The lot fell upon a Lieutenant Sandys, who, in the name of himself and his brother officers, sent the challenge, which Bull had too much spirit to decline, though determined, as he told his second, not to fire, having no personal injury to redress. They went out, Sandys fired, and Captain Bull fell. The systematic cowardice of the plot, and the untimely fate of so excellent a young man, strongly agitated the feelings of all. Sandys, and Yeaman, a Lieutenant in the same regiment, his second, were brought down to the Presidency, and tried at the ensuing sessions for wilful murder. The grass cutters and the [illegible], who had observed them going out together and returning, and a water bearer, who had actually seen the duel, were sometimes at a loss to identify Sandys and Yeaman; and the prisoners had, moreover, the advantage of a jury of [illegible] shopkepers, who serving the different regiments with stores, had on former occasions acquitted officers under similar charges, and aggravated as the present case was probably felt a like indisposition to convict. They were acquitted, therefore, but against the strong and pointed directions of the Judge, Sir Henry Gwillim, who told the jury, that it would be trifling with his own oath not to tell them that it was a case of foul and deliberate murder. They deliberated, or pretended to deliberate for half an hour; and during this time, the judge who could not imagine that any other verdict could be brought in but that of guilty, had already laid his black cap upon his note book, prepared to pass the sentence of the law upon them, and which, as he told the prisoners, it was his intention to have carried into effect. "You have had," said he, addressing them with great solemnity, "a narrow escape, and too merciful a jury. If they can, let them reconcile their verdict to God and their consciences. For my part, I assure you, had the verdict been what the facts of the case so fully warranted, that in twenty four hours, you should both of you have been cold and unconscious corses—as cold and unconscious as that of the poor young man whom, by a wicked conspiracy and a wicked deed you drove out of existence. Become repent of your sins. You are men of blood; and that blood cries up to Heaven against you." Sandys and Yeaman, were afterwards tried by a Court Martial, found guilty of the conspiracy against the life of Captain Bull, and broke. The sentence was confirmed by the King, with an additional clause, declaring them incapable for ever of again serving his Majesty.
