[From the N.Y. Jour. Com.]

The Journal du Havre, of Feb. 2, says, "If we may trust reports which are in circulation, Prussia has not in fact been invited by Russia to conclude an alliance against the Sublime Porte; but is collecting her troops on the frontiers of Poland, in order that the Polish army, without which the good order of the realm might be disturbed, may be removed to the seat of war, and also guarantee that Finland shall be protected against Sweden."

THE EMIGRATING SWISS.—

The same paper says, "Since the cold has become so unusually severe in this vicinity, we have had under our eyes a most afflicting spectacle, viz. the poor Swiss and Abacians, who, without any resources, and most of them burdened with large families of children, have come to Havre, seeking a passage to the United States. A miserable woman of their number it is said, has been found dead in one of our streets, still holding in her arms the infant which she was nursing. Another woman and her four children, who would soon have perished with the cold, has been carried to the Hospital."

ENGLAND AND RUSSIA.—As it can hardly be doubted that the chances of peace or general war in Europe depend much upon the feelings of these two countries with regard to each other; and as in particular, the acquiescence of England in the invasion of Turkey, and the blockade of the Dardanelles, by Russia, has been expressly placed upon the ground of the confidence reposed by the British Government in the personal character and professions of the Autocrat, it cannot be uninteresting to acute observers, to see in what tone Russia and Russian affairs are treated by a Journal, that although professedly literary, and without any avowed official character, is yet supposed to be frequently used by the British Government either to feel, or to give a wished for direction to, public opinion.

With these impressions, we annex some extracts from the first article in the latest number of the London Quarterly. It professes to be a review of Dr. Granville's travels to St. Petersburg, and of Colonel Evans' book portraying in alarming colors, the pretensions and powers of Russia. After slashing, not without good cause, at the silly egotism of the travelling doctor, the title of whose book occupies two lines—while those of the writer require for their enumeration some twelve or fifteen, and then end with an &c.—the reviewer proceeds to state his own opinions and doubts about the character of Nicholas—the resources of his empire; and concludes with what may be called a jubilation on the utter defeats by Turkey singleheaded of the Russian advance. The tone and temper of these remarks strike us as significant. The extracts follow:

Dr. Granville assures his readers, with the utmost confidence, that the good faith of the Emperor Nicholas may be perfectly relied on, in all that regards his engagements to the allies, in the treaty to which he was a party, of the 6th July 1827, because "his political life has never belied any of those strict principles which, in private life, have by general acknowledgment been known to guide his conduct."

This may or may not be the case, has hereafter shall appear; but at the present moment, he labors under something more than a suspicion of a want of sincerity, which has weakened very considerably that 'reliance' of which Dr. Granville speaks. On a provocation from Turkey, no matter whether slight or otherwise, he has declared war against her; but, with a generosity for which he obtained adequate applause, he voluntarily offered to waive the privilege of a belligerent in the Mediterranean, and to adhere there strictly to the conditions of the treaty of London, the sole object of which was to liberate the Greeks from the Turkish yoke, in whose fate he pretended to be most deeply interested. No sooner, however, did he find that the Turks were not so easily beaten as he had supposed; that Varna, and Chumla, and Silistria retarded his progress towards the capital, than he sends an order direct from Odessa, to Count Heyden, who was acting in concert with the other two allied admirals, passing over the regular channels of communicating his intention to England and France, instituted a blockade of the Dardanelles: Of course he ceases to be any longer a party to the treaty. Having thus broken faith with his allies, and left the Greeks as far as he was concerned, to the mercy of the Turks, what guarantee have we that he will serve more religiously his solemn avowal against any intention for territorial aggrandizement?

The truth is, the accounts of the Russian army, of its discipline and valor, have been most grossly exaggerated. It never amounted at any one time to four hundred thousand efficient troops, spread over a surface equal to one-tenth part of the habitable globe. Its commissariat in a miserable state; and as to its discipline we can state on good authority that when the battering train was brought up before Varna, it was found that the shot would not fit the cannon, & they were obliged to send to Moscow and Petersburg for a supply. As to their valor, it is, probably, on a par with that which is common to most armed bodies.—The want of discipline in the Turks, judging from the results, could only have been compensated by, if not a superior, at least an equal degree of valor. The long protracted sieges of Chumla and Varna have fully established this point. Here the Russians have gained no reputation, but, on the contrary, have lost character, by purchasing the surrender of the latter fortress from a Macedonian traitor, half Greek and half Turk, the price, as we have been informed, being 500,000 rubles, argent comptant, protection to himself and followers, and an establishment on the Crimea, where this base wretch will live suspected and despised, and die perhaps à la Czar.

We are just in time to state the disastrous finale, which we have received from an authentic source, of the rash and precipitous invasion of the Turkish territory by Russia—that alarming invasion which, in the opinion of Lieutenant Colonel Evans, demanded an immediate armed intervention of all the powers of Europe, to stay the overwhelming career of the autocrat, who aimed at little less than universal dominion. The Turks, however, have done it effectually of themselves, single-handed, without the assistance of any one power, European or Asiatic; and the Sublime Sultan may now boast, with the Roman warrior, —like an eagle in a dove-cote, I Flutter'd your Russians in Bulgaria; Alone I did it.

Fluttered, indeed, with a vengeance! The route was complete; resembling on a smaller scale, that of the French from Moscow. We are told that not a living creature escaped out of this horrible Bulgaria, save man—and he, bare and destitute of every thing that constitutes a soldier, without arms, without accoutrements, without baggage, and as the French would say, completely demoralized; all the draft horses, and cattle of every kind; wagons, ammunition, and provisions, left behind, as spoil for the Turks. The extent of these disasters is endeavored to be concealed at Petersburg, where the war from the first, was unpopular; but now men shake their heads, by which like the shake of Burleighs in the play, they mean a great deal, tho' they say nothing; & they are afraid to write, as all letters are inspected at the post office. It is to be hoped that disastrous campaign will have taught the young emperor a lesson of moderation, which will counsel him to seek for peace rather than conquest.
