THE ORGANIZATION OF CONGRESS

The electric intelligence from Washington received by Telegraph, left parties in precisely the same dead lock, in which they have been [illegible] the commencement of the session. Whether at the hour we are writing, an organization of the House has been effected, is highly probable, but it is quite certain that up to yesterday noon, comprising a period of eight working days, every effort to elect a Speaker has completely failed. Most unhappily for the interest of the country, neither of the two great parties, into which the majority of all parties in the House of Representatives, and the great mass of the Representatives in the country are divided, seem to be hard and tyrannically [illegible] a hundred or one-hundred ten votes, who [illegible] the Free Soilers are allowed to have their own terms, and conditions — [illegible] and hampered by the arbitrary [illegible] a very factious, neither the Whigs nor the Democrats were able to bring about an organization, without a partial surrender on their side, by means of a compromise of extreme sentiments.

We know that it is asking much of human nature [illegible] assembled in the agora of discussion, and prepared to exhibit all the gladiatorial skill and practised dogmatism — [illegible] for the office their party hostility, and [illegible] by which they may [illegible] the honors and emoluments [illegible] annihilate the malignant influence of the Abolitionists. But the vital interests of the country, the conceded impossibility of organizing in the present state of parties, and above all the paramount obligation to bring a halt about the cohort of fanatics, who are [illegible] nothing but mischief, and who delight in breeding and fostering ill feeling, should admonish both parties of the wisdom of a compromise. What more prudent and unobjectionable course can be suggested, that the Whigs and Democrats should meet together and [illegible] compromise by which [illegible] be carried out bodily. Give [illegible] to Mr. Winthrop, or Mr. [illegible] the understanding [illegible] the committees, the administration of the House, in proportion to numbers, and [illegible] Draw lots for the Clerk, Doorkeeper and Sergeant at Arms. Set [illegible] the two parties represented in the House of Representatives, and by an amicable vote [illegible] the schemes of the agitators — [illegible] of Congressmen at all parties [illegible] they are willing to [illegible] [illegible] the Speaker, as [illegible] the Clerk, Doorkeeper,
