THE NORTHERN MAIL failed yesterday from beyond Charleston. We received one of the latest mails with dates from New York to the 19th, and from Washington to the 14th. Four days intervene.

KOSSUTH FREE SOIL DEMOCRACY. Whatever arguments we have felt constrained to urge against the changes proposed by Kossuth in the policy which has hitherto marked our relations with the powers of Europe, we have never sought to discuss our admiration of the man and our exalted estimate of his moral and intellectual worth. Kossuth, in our humble estimate, is among the first men of the age—endowed with a mind of wonderful ascendency, a heart warm and a lofty soul, that stoops to no meanness, no mean or unpatriotic action, and is the cynosure of the most gifted and noble minds of the age. A patriot, a statesman, and a hero, combining the most glorious energies, with the most profound knowledge, a true heart, an enthusiastic and indomitable lover of liberty. His acquaintance with the literature of England, acquired in a prison, is SHAKSPEARE and a lexicon for his teacher, is absolutely marvellous. The very smack of conversation, which characterizes his speech, is worth his weight in gold, for it is redolent of originality, and consequently imparts pith and condensed meaning to his words. Take him all in all, he is a man of the second or third ability, worthy to be ranked among the Hampdens of Old Britain. He is a man of perfection as an impossibility. We have seen astonishing men. Kossuth is one, and they commit a blunder. As a man, we have concerned knowledge of the polished, the refined, the cultivated, the candid, the honest, the reverent with whom he is daily brought in contact, that fortune has been lavish in his favors, and it is equally certain that nothing his prudence and caution, have combined unsoothed. A few months Hungarian was feasted, praised, and the testimony of New York journal proves that on his name was innocently made the pass-word of Free Soilers. The Band of Free Soilers.
