PARISIANS,

The imposing recital of those sublime deed of courage and generosity, which eminently characterize your heroic population, whist is ensured our respect, has commanded our admiration. Brave Parisians, you have crowned France with a new holo of glory; Europe will be indebted to you for its independence and its lib rties; you have deserved well of the uni

Parisians-Glory be to you; glory to the brave. The pure patriotism of which you have given such glaring proofs, entitles you to the eternal veneration of nations. Honour be to the great citizens who fearlessly stepped forth in the hour of danger, and noby devoted them selves to the dignity and happiness of regenerated France. Honored, above all, be Lafayette and Dupont de l'Eure, In them, republican France could boast of a Washington and a Jefferson; they might have been chief-magistrates of the French people. But Ladayette and Dupont de l'Eure presented Louis l'hiliope to a grateful country, and the patriot soldier of Jemmape and Fleurus, resting on a hero and a sage, was borne to the throne of the great nation, amidst the acclamations of the heroic people of the three memorable days. Hommage be paid to the citizen King! Hommage to the constit itional head of the most popular of representative monarchies.

Brave Paristans-In common with us, you already cherished recollections of the month of July, in the confederation of the French, the overthrow of the Bastille; but despotism had inhibited the celebration of your popula festivals. Never firth those great solemnities will be un with renovated splendour in the annals of your country. You will soon be called upon to celebrate, with a pomp worthy the mijesty of the French nation, the stupendous events of the great week; wreathe then the starry bunner with the tricolored flag, and may this emblem of paternal union, between the American and the French people, stand as warr uted omen of the independance and freedom of nations in both hemispheres. But why must tears of sorrow blend with the song of gladness; why the cypress overshadow the laurel! Foy, Manuel, Larochefoucault-Liancourt, Benjamin Constant. you were the benefactors of France, you have deserved the honour of apsthesis; grateful France flings open to you the gates of her

Parisians-We, as well as yourselves, have had our days on mourning and altern : for chance had decree! that New Orleans should undergo the fate of ancient Orleans. England was advancing against us, threstening and tersword of his country. With the sound of his persuasive voice, the French rushed to our ranks, they buttled bravely for the pride of the g orious standard immortalized by Washington and Laftyette.-The Brittons disappeared The people of Louisiana spand in its freedom, in ependence and sovereignty. Thus then the hospitable city, where the exiled patriot who was one day to be proclaimed King of the French, once found a refuge in the days of misfortune the new florissing city in which the Champion of freedom in either world, lately termi ated his triumphal march; New-Orleins was indebted to: its preservation, to the valor of the French banded with the Americans, under the command of the warake Farmer, to whom the people of the Uni n have entrusted with the chief magistracy of the Republic. Brave Parisians-lo the burst of our deep gratitude and Kvely sympathy, we view the French and Ame ricans with the same feelings. We are happy of the prosperity of France, after having swalled her misfortunes; we are proud of her triumphs, we who have ever been concerned for
