FOR PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
HENRY CLAY,
OF KENTUCKY.
Subject to the decision of a National Convention.

NEW-ORLEANS:

☞ The northern mail did not arrive yesterday; consequently, our paper is barren of commercial or other news from the north.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF A NATIONAL BANK

In yesterday's paper we argued the constitutionality of a national bank, on the ground of precedent. We showed that Gen. Washington considered a bank constitutional, that the Supreme court had so decided the question, that both political parties in congress had concurred in admitting its constitutionality, and that Mr. Madison had signed its charter. We still now endeavor to sustain the constitutional question by arguments drawn from the constitution itself.

The party in favor of a national bank do not assert that the constitution "confers any direct power upon congress to create such an institution, but they maintain that such power is incidental to other prerogatives granted by the constitution. It may be proved to be long to the power of collecting and disbursing the public revenue, of borrowing money on the credit of the United States, of regulating commerce, of fixing and regulating the standard of value, and thereby ensuring uniformity and equality of taxation. There are various clauses in the constitution which it would seem impossible to carry into efficient execution without the agency of a corporation. Let us look at this question somewhat closely.

Of itself, and without any special object, congress has clearly no right under the constitution to create a corporation. It can enact no laws save such as are necessary to carry into effect the powers entrusted to its jurisdiction. Now if among those powers there are any which cannot be carried into effect without the aid of a bank, is it not a clear inference that under this authority congress has the constitutional right to create a bank? There is nothing in the nature of a bank which renders it unfit to become an instrument in the hands of government. The individuals composing a corporation might accomplish in their private capacity all that could be done as a corporate body, provided they could command the confidence and trust of the community. Mr. McDuffie's friend, the late Stephen Girard as a private individual, established a bank. He established a bank by a charter which empowered him to issue extensive circulation.

Congress has the power to create a corporation in order to carry its laws into effect. It remains to be seen whether the laws which would require the agency of a bank. The powers to raise, collect, and disburse the public revenue, to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and to pay the public debt were those which were supposed in the discussions of 1791 and in the decisions of the Supreme court, to confer the incidental right of incorporating a bank. No one will deny that these operations have been facilitated by a bank—no one will question the utility of such an institution to the public finances. Is not the present crisis an admirable illustration of this doctrine? We have now no national bank, and the revenues are neither collected, disbursed nor transferred with security. They are entrusted to the care of individuals who abuse the trust and defraud the government. This occurs at a period when the diminished revenue and increased expenditure of the government call for every cent of its fiscal resources, and the difficulties in the way of a faithful collector of the revenue, added to the defalcations of public officers, embarrass the government, and force it to resort to new and extraordinary means of meeting its expenditures. This did not, nor could not take place under a national bank.

The power to charter a bank is implied from the constitutional prerogative of congress, "to coin money and fix the value thereof." The argument of Mr. McDuffie on this clause is so luminous that we will not mar it by an abridgment:

> "But, for the interest of the community at large, as well as for the purposes of the treasury, it is essential that the nation should possess a currency of equal value, credit and use, wherever it may circulate. The constitution has entrusted congress exclusively with the power of creating and regulating a currency of that description, and the measures which were taken during the last session, in exercise of the power, give every promise of success. The bank of the United States under auspices the most favorable, cannot fail to be an important auxiliary."

At that period, embarrassments and difficulties oppressed the nation similar to those under which we now labor. After the expiration of the charter of the first bank in 1811, the people suffered for some years without a remedy. A national bank was at length created—and renewed prosperity succeeded. To the alternative was the democratic party forced twenty three years ago, and to this alternative will it come again.

TENNESSEE ELECTIONS

DEFINITIVE.—Nashville papers of the 9th contain returns from all the counties in the state, except three in the eastern section. The result comes up to our worst anticipations. POLK is elected governor by a majority ranging between 2 and 3,000. The next will have a majority of both houses of the legislature. The only consolation left to the whigs is that they have elected seven members of congress. The majority of the delegation. It is cheering to have these gloomy tidings. Give the firm and constant friends of the whig [illegible] from being disheartened. [illegible] begin to rally for the [illegible] of the whigs [illegible]

FROM MEXICO.

By the schooner Comercio, from Vera Cruz, which she left on the 9th instant, we have received late Mexican intelligence. Little that is novel or interesting has transpired. At the time of the departure of the Camanche business at Vera Cruz was at a very low ebb, and there were but few vessels in the port. The report of Santa Ana's assassination is certainly false.

Lemus and Canales have had no encounter with the government troops. Insurgents were coming in from all quarters seeking pardon for having taken up arms against the central government.

The Camanche brought $16,500 in specie, consigned to different commercial houses.

MR. JONES, the inventor of the patent cotton machinery for plantation use, has politely sent us a pamphlet, containing a description in English, French and Spanish, of his useful instruments, together with a plate explanatory of the same. A constant supply of the cotton gin, with its latest improvements, is kept for sale, by Messrs. Maunsel, White & Co., of this city.

☞ The August number of the "AMERICAN PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL" sustains the character which this youthful but able periodical has already acquired.—The leading article on the efficiency of the brain as the organ of the mind, from the elegant pen of professor Caldwell, is replete with that depth of argument, clothed in highly eloquent language, for which that eminent phrenologist is remarkable. The Phrenological Journal is an efficient advocate of this popular system of mental philosophy.

COLEMAN'S MONTHLY MISCELLANY.—The second number has abundant talent and variety, and is a thousand per cent better than the first. The story of Ringwood the Rover, by the author of the Brothers, is a tale of powerful and continued interest. The moral and miscellaneous disquisitions are generally sensible and happy. This periodical bids fair to attain an enviable reputation.

DANIEL WEBSTER

The annexed letter from a correspondent of the New York Mirror, will enable our readers to form an adequate idea of the sensation created in London by the great orator and statesman. We do not wonder, by the way, that phrenologists crowd to examine his developements. His head is a noble vindication of the science. The forehead is enormous, broad, arched, prominent and expansive.

MR. WEBSTER IN LONDON.—Were you to ask me who was the greatest man now in London, I should say, unhesitatingly, Daniel Webster. He is feted and dined without intermission. Artists are besetting him to sit for his picture, and phrenologists are crowding to get a sight of his wonderful cerebral developements. Webster is one of those men who carry the stamp of greatness, unquestionably upon their brows. No one can see him, and doubt his intellectual pre-eminence. I have perceived that in the manner of most of the Americans whom I have encountered in society here, there was an obvious constraint of manner, an assumption of dignity, and a constant apprehension lest, by some solecism, they should do discredit to their country by their ignorance. How different the demeanor of Webster! With what an unconstrained consciousness of equality, and what simply simplicity and ease does he mingle among the self titled dignitaries of our land! Talk of the aristocracy of birth and the graces of hereditary gentility—now paltry and ungraceful do they seem by the side of such aristocracy as Webster's—the aristocracy of talent and the graces of conscious power! We are all expecting, with interest, to hear a specimen of Mr. Webster's oratory, and an opportunity will soon be presented in the public dinner to be given him by the countrymen in London, for his display. We have no man in this country who is superior in conversational powers."

FACTS NEVER LIES.—Among the forests of Tartary and of South America, where the wild horse is gregarious, there are herds of 200 or 300, which, being all prepared for fighting or indeed, for any service, and knowing that their safety is in flight, when they sleep, appoint one in rotation, who acts as sentinel while the rest are asleep. If a man approaches, the sentinel walks towards him, as if to reconnoiter, or see whether he may be deterred from coming near; if the man continues, he neighs aloud, and in a peculiar tone, which awakes the herd, and all gallop away. The sentinel bringing up the rear. Nothing can be more judicious or rational than this arrangement, simple as it is. So a horse, belonging to a smuggler at Dover, used to be taken with rum spirits, and sent on the road, unattended, to reach the rendezvous. When he descried a soldier, he would jump off the highway, and hide himself in a ditch; and when discovered, would fight for his load. The cunning of foxes is proverbial; but I know not if it ever was more remarkably displayed than in the duke of Beaufort's country, where Reynard, being hard pressed, disappeared suddenly, and was, after strict search, found immersed in a water pool, up to the very snout, by which he held a willow bough, hanging over the pond. The resemblance between the animals (besides his great knowledge of his species) than my excellent learned, and ingenious friend, the sergeant; and he possesses many curious ones himself. This anecdote of a drover's dog is striking, as he gave it to me when we happened, near this place, to meet a drove.

The man had brought seventeen out of twenty or so from a field leaving the remaining three there, incensed with another herd. He then said to the dog, go fetch them, and he went and singled out those very three. The sergeant's brother, however, a highly respectable man, lately sheriff of London, has a dog that distinguishes Saturday night, from the practice of being him up for the Sunday, which he dislikes. He will escape on Saturday night, and return on Monday morning. The sergeant himself had a gander which was at a distance from the house, and, hearing her make an extraordinary noise, ran back, and seized a head into the cage—then brought back a duck, one by one, and put them into [illegible] whose separation from her [illegible]

INTERESTING CEREMONY

Married, on the morning of the 31st ultimo at the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, in this city, by the Reverend Dr Milnor, Mr J H BUSSERT, of Lansingburgh, N. Y., to Miss PHEBE USHOUSE, of Castile, Genesee county, N. Y., (a pupil of the institution.)

We have seldom attended a matrimonial ceremony of more agreeable interest than the one above mentioned. It was a gala day at the institution. The annual examination of the school at the close of the term had passed off successfully the day before, and the summer vacation was just commencing. The secretary of state, in his official capacity, as superintendent of schools, together with several other literary gentlemen of distinction, had attended the examination, and all expressed themselves highly gratified with the progress of the pupils, and the prosperity of the institution; the majority of the pupils were just about to take their accustomed summer tour into the country, to visit their parents and friends, and the wedding was to be the finale of the term. Health, hope and happiness reigned among the inmates of the youthful mute community, and the language of every countenance seemed to be "come haste to the wedding—then haste to our homes."

At nine and a half, A. M., the bride and her maids were dressed and decked with flowers, and the bridegroom and several of his relatives and friends arrived in carriages from town. Four pretty deaf mute girls officiated as bride's maids, accompanied by two dead mute young men, and two of the young gentlemen professors of the institution. Attended by these four couples, the pair betrothed at ten o'clock, entered the [illegible] apartment in the west wing of the institution. In the presence of an assemblage of two hundred persons, they were to be united in "the holy state of matrimony." The ceremony was [illegible] the usual form, by the Rev. [illegible] was performed by [illegible] in an [illegible] elegant and forcible mode of [illegible] language. The solemnities of the occasion were terminated by prayers and benedictions. Then followed the usual congratulations, refreshments, &c., and at eleven o'clock the bride, after taking an affectionate leave of her fellow pupils, her instructors and friends at the institution, departed with her husband and his friends, to her new home, west of the Passaic.

EXTRAORDINARY COURAGE IN A LAD.—A lad in Halifax, Pa., named George Peters, son of D. F. Peters, esq. was furiously attacked the other day by his father's bull, and would inevitably have been killed but for his surprising presence of mind. Seeing no chance of escape, he dodged the attack of the furious animal and leaped upon his back! The bull, thereupon, ran off in a canter, kicking and roaring fearfully; but the little fellow, no way disconcerted, clung to the animal's back, until a favorable opportunity offering, he jumped off and immediately leaped a fence hard by. This latter feat was witnessed by his mother, who was attracted to the spot by his cries. He is only 13 years old.—York Democrat.

THE LIGHT OF THE STARS.—The light of the stars is not uniform; the ray of Sirius, for instance, differs not merely in intensity, but in kind from the ray of Vega; and in countries where the atmosphere is less humid and hazy than ours the difference is striking to the naked eye; one star shining as an emerald, another as a ruby, and the whole heavens sparkling as with various gems. This attribute of variety of color also characterizes the double stars, but the most remarkable thing is that in many instances where one star is of one marked color its companion is of the opposite.

Instances abound in which a red and a green star are associated, or a yellow and blue. When the stars are of different degrees of brilliancy, this contrast may originate in optical delusion—in that tendency which disposes the eye, when gazing on any bright color, to endow fainter objects near it with the opposite, or complimentary color, by way of relief; but the explanation is not universally borne out, insuperable as many couples in precisely similar circumstances, show no such contrasts. Sir John Herschell was at first decidedly inclined to attribute the phenomenon to an actual difference of color, and although he has since, perhaps on good grounds, half relinquished that conclusion, we have the acquiescing testimony of Struve, whose clearness has never yet been rivalled, so that we may not absolutely part with the early, pleasing speculations of the British astronomer.

It may easier be suggested in words, (says Sir John) than come level in imagination, what variety of illumination, two stars—one red and a green, or yellow and a blue one, must afford a planet, circulating around either; and what cheering contrasts, and graceful vicissitudes, a red and a green day for instance, alternating with a white one, and with darkness, might arise from the presence or absence, or both, from the horizon.
