There is in his unconquerable affection and steedy faith to to Bourbons, that which elevates and dignifies human nature. He has never, for one instant, flinched in converge —never wavered in his attachment to this fated family,—We find him under the Republic, under the Eupire, under the rule of the citizen-king, under every phasis of fortune, will the same, never striking his banner of loyalty to adverse fortune, or entangled in the influences which were sorted on every side of him, to seduce his honest spirit.

verse fortune, or entangled in the influences which were spread on every side of him, to seduce his honest apint from the path of duty. These reflections were excited in us on perusing the following letter, in which his generous devotion to fallen greatness, when almost totally wrecked on the shore of calainity is finely exemptied.

M. Chatcaubriand being refused permission to visit the uchess de Berri at Blaye, has addressed the following letter to the editor of a Carlist paper in Paris:

"Sir—Madame the Duchess de Berri has a support of a calainity to select the sales on Friday last, which went officen id to id, per lb. higher, a good deal than has been done. Would it be too much too ask of relaings of the victum. Would it be too much too ask of relia-tions, seated on the throne, which ought to be filled by the sin of Maria Caroline, just as much humanity as the Con-vention made a point of showing? There is not in history an example of a moral to-tore equal to fix which the de-scend ints of Henry IV, is made to endure. It is the orly greatness which quasi-legitimacy can boast. I do not invoke the law, what is the law to those who deride the liberation from which they have deviated, and who boast of this illegality? The idea of knocking at the gates of Blave occurred to the; but I do not know how to argue with poice officers, to dispute with spies, or to contend with gen-armes. I could not expect from the politeness of General Beaugeaud, a favor, the granting of which would not de-pend upon him. At present, therefore, it is sufficient for me that the Duchess do Berri should know that I am more eady than ever to obey her orders, to devote myself to her nisfortunes. May she live long for those who would no infortunes. May sue tive long for times who makes a consoled for having lost her, and whose respectful at-achment is increased by the admiration excited by her courage.
