are charged considered the supertant that would coule neededness, one of the most important that would coule before congress at its present session. He desired to be distinctly understood, that in the remarks he should make, he tinetly-understood, that in the remarks he should make, he should divest himself of all party feeling. He would be the last to raise an objection to the course recommended by the Executive upon mere party grounds. He had no doubt that this officer had done as he thought right, & he had nothing to censure on that account. But the President, in regard to our relations with France, had imposed upon the legislature, a high responsibility, and to this body, the whole pepple must look for the consequences which most flow from earde iberations upon the subject. It was not to be disjuised, that the course suggested by the President was taken and effective that the course suggested by the President was taken and effective that the course suggested by the President was taken and effective that the course suggested by the president was taken and effective that the course suggested by the President was taken and effective that the course suggested by the President was taken and effective that the course suggested by the President was taken and effective that the course suggested by the President was taken and effective the course suggested by the President was taken and effective that the course suggested by the president was taken and effective the course suggested by the President was taken and the president was taken and the president was taken as the president was t tamount to a declaration of war. The time might confer-and circumstances might arise, when a war might become necessiry, but that time had certainly not yet arrived.

Mr C. read several pactages from the President's Mes age on the subject before the House, and appealed to the sandor of gentlemen to say whether, if the sugge-tions should be approved and acted on by Congress, it would not eventuate in war, and that too with one of the would not eventuate in war, and that too with one of the proudest and most formilable nations in the world-had been said that delay was ucross ary—that the question in constroversy might be already settled by the action of the French Chambers. If so, the course which he pro-posed, would show the friendly feelings of this nation towards their arcient ally. By he debates in the French Chamber, it seemed that the subject of our claims was ally contested and opposed on the ground of right. Was it then contested and opposed on the ground of right. Was it then to be expected, that went this haughty and high minded people would not cenerdo, upon argument, would be yielded, when they should be put in possession of the menaces contained in the President's Message?

Mr Claiborne considered this a most inspectant question. Although not inclined to trouble the homse, yet were he dumb, the feelings which then animated him, might break the hands of silence. The winds of bleavant and the possession of the president of the homse.
