The former in the house of peers before the Easter recess, had made some illiberal remarks on O'Connels who retorted in the commons by calling his lerdship a 'bloated buffoon.' Alvanley for this sent a challenge to O'Connell; but not till two days after when the latter had sailed for Ireland; and then he published his letter in the London journals. Instantly Morgan O'Connell presented himself as a substitute for his father; wrote Alvanley a letter-which produced a chale lenge accepted immediately. That ovening both parties met, when mistaking the signal for the word of command O'Connell fired on his adversary, but without effect. Colonel Damer (the second of lord Alvanley) demanded a return of the compliment on the part of this principal; but colonel Hodges refused it for his second; when ford Elvanley gellantly waived his right. Two shots were subsequently exchanged without effect, when both parties left the ground account of words uttered by his father; but his invitation was refused.
