From the London United Service Journal. LANG'S PATENT CORDAGE.

The manufacture of cordage is an object of parametric importance see maritime country, although the consumption of hemoen rope has lately been more successfully invaded by the use of iron chains, than ever it was by the various attempts made with hides, wool, grass, and other materials. We have, therefore, perused the pamphlet circulated by Macnab and Company, of Greenock, with considerable interest, and can recess mend it to the notice of our readers as a clear expusition mend it to the notice of our readers as a clear exposuon of a most useful invention.

The art of rope-making had been a sort of rule of thumb process till our own days: and no very serious attempts were made to sorrest the obvious defect of different tension on the component perts of the twisted strand. The science of Huddart, hewever, and the practice of Chapman, were brought to bear upon this important point, and introduced the principle, by which an increase in the strength of the cordage was effected an increase in the strength of the cordage was effected by simply so constructing the rope, as that every yarn is enacle to bear its own proportion of the strain. And it is by carrying this principle to its utmost that Mr Lang has been enabled to effect an additional inspease of strength, and, consequently, of durability to the rope. This has been accomplished by means of a machine affording a more just arrangement, regular twisting, and equal bearing of the fibrous substates which are employed in the composition of the variation at her temployed in position of the yarns than any heretofore used. and recourse to experiment to decide netween them. The result was, that contrary to all expectation, the twisting was found to diminish the strength of the rope; whapee it was readily inferred that it diminishes it the more as cording to the system in use previous to Capitain Hud-dart's making the yarms all bear an equal proposition of the strain. Successive improvement capital the strands to be laid more analously in the rope, and every strand to mensive an equal degree of twist, the which the rope was resident stronger, and of a general degree of strength carried into still greater effect and by it the regular spin-sing of yorns, which had hisherto be a prepared in a tedious and clumsy manner by hanc labour is accom-plished. But a still more jumpertant poject has been achieved. By the same plan, the himp, to whatever achieved, heing drawn over a new ression, of with Secretary and the decomposition of the property of the propert
