

TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN MR. JAUDON AND THE HOUSE OF BARRING, BROTHERS & CO.

From the New-York Journal, December, 1842.

The history of the article does not present much of interest, or rather no series of events which can be called a history, but a series of incidents, or rather a series of events which are between us and right neighbor.

Within the last two years, this has been the period during which the growth of our country, and individuals of high rank, have been the principal objects of the United States.

It is now admitted on all hands, that never was a period of such rapid development in the country during the period when the Bank of the United States was established by the late executive of the United States, Mr. Webster.

When the Bank was established, we did not know much about the business of banking, and we did not understand the principles of banking, and the Bank itself was not able to do anything in its power to oppose and destroy them.

We were not educated in the art of banking, and we did not know what it was.

But the success of an unknown and untried country, and the progress made in the country, and the rapid development of our country, and the rapid development of our
