The following excellent anecdote of Benjamin Harrison, the father of the People's Candidate for the Presidency, and one of the immertal Signers of the Declaration of Independence, is related by Sparks in his biography of Franklin:—
"The moderate party, at the head of which was Mr. Dickenson, had succeeded in obtaining a vote for another untition to the King from the Congress of his satisfaction by saying— There is but one word, Mr. President, in the paper which I disapprove, and that word is Congress. Whereupon, Mr. Harrison, of Virginis, immediately rose and said— There is but one word in the paper, Mr. President, which approve, and that word is Congress."

An eloquent writer in the April number of the Southern Literary Messenger, in the course of an article on the subject of the Navy, thus alludes to the battlerof the Constitution and Guerriere.

In 1819, the Constitution and Guerriere, and a handful of American seamen had the boner of demonstrating a problem on the sea, which nations had been straining a problem on the sea, which nations had been straining a problem on the sea, which nations had been straining a problem on the sea, which nations had been straining a problem on the sea, which nations had been straining a problem on the sea, which nations had been straining a problem on the sea, which nations had been straining a problem on the sea, which nations had been straining a problem on the sea, which nations had been straining a problem on the sea, which nations had been straining a problem on the sea, which nations had been strained to consider difficult, if not impossible of solution. In one half hour, the charm which for age had hong around the "wooden walls of Ol! England," and which held whole navies spell-bound, was good to be considered the reshress of her own class.

The shot first fell short, then began to reach, and finally to tell. The impatient erew turned from the vannting Englishman to their own comutan ler, to eatch, if they might, by a glance of the sye or the motion of a lip, the half spoken order. But all that could be read in the regular lines of that countrance was the coolness of bravery, and the stern resolve 'to do or die." The Guerriere, enveloped in a cloud of smoke from ber briekly worked battery, confinned to near—Her shot few thicker and thicker; and louder and louder agree their whistle through the air.
