reflect the highest credit to the enterprising company owning her.

The accommodations for passengers in this magnificient ship are of the very first order, combining the advantages of ample light, air and space with the richest and most elegant decoration.

The upper deck consists of a saloon or dining roon 34 feet wide by 28 feet long, communicating by a double entrance, with a wide and lofty corridor, which reaches entirely to the after part of the ship. On each side the corridor are spacious state-rooms for first class passengers, excellently lighted and ventilated, not entered as they usually are, immediately lighted from the public walk, but from separate passages, each containing a large window. At the after end of this deck is a commodious room expressly for the Ladies' Room, and a large state-room for a private family.

The style of decoration of the whole is the Tudor Gothic of the 14th and 15th centuries.

On entering the dining saloon from two lobilies, the appearance of it is very quiet and chaste. The pannelling on all sides consists of Gothic work, richly carved, and painted to imitate new oak highly polished, the ground of the pannels being of a simple, neat color. The furniture is all of real English Oak, highly poished, with Gothic carving, and covered with embosed Utrecht Velvet of a rich brown color. The dining tables are four in number, placed lengthwise of the ship, and when fully extended, will accommodate 120 persons to dine. The softs are placed along the sides of the room and at each of the four windows. There are four handsome Gothic sideboards, neatly fitted up with a portrait of a "President" (Washington being one) over each. The whole, with the help of several mirrors, has are exceedingly light and elegant effect.
