what we had occasion yesterday to remark upon the probable effect on our agriculture of the repeal of the British Corn Laws — "Protection Ead existed in England from the days of the Phattagenets, whilst the whole line of country opposite, on the continent—France. Belgium, Holland and Prassua—indeed, almost every country in the world, monarchical Europe as well as Republican America, had its protective laws and regulations. The notile ford then commented on the speech of Lord John Russell, recently delivered at Glasgow. He denied the noble lords statement that England was the worst culvitated country in the world. Within his Lord Ashlourion's recollection the produce of the soil in his neighborhood had augmented fifty per cent, and is was certain that no branch of public industry had advanced, or was now more steadily advancing, than the cultivation of the soil. Lord John Russell had drawn a charining picture of two nations of the same kindred—England and America—the former. Now he "Lord Ashbourion" was far from saying any thing against the people of America, with whom he had had the advantage of negotiation on the part of this country. He believed there were many most honorable men amongst them, and for himself he saw no ground for apprehending that there was the least likelinood of a disturbance between the two countrees. He believed that the good sense of the country would overpower any disposition of that kind, but we must not lorger there were two parties to an agreement, and what if Araperca should retuse to take our clothing, seek knowing at the time they did so that we were compelled, by the circumsances of our position, to take their centry.
