THE ADMINISTRATION.

A though we would reluctantly have preferred seeing Gen. TAYLOR backed by a majority of politics a theirs in the first Congress that assembles under his administration, we are far from attaching any sinister importance to the fact, that he has failed to secure the preponderance. In advance of the development of his policy, before a long canvassing of his views and sentiments has reached the people, an adverse Congress is constituted. Can this be considered a popular verdict? Can the people undertake to arraign the administration, ere it has committed an overt act, or to condemn it for unknown crimes? By no possible process of reasoning could it be accepted that Gen. TAYLOR is actually opposed, because no measure can say what Gen. TAYLOR possesses, or what he has done, to provoke the denunciation and the desertion of the masses. When the session of Congress assembles, after the adjournment of which we have been treated, we shall be in a condition to form that the complexion of that body may be varied, and a numerical definite expression of popular sentiment. As it is, we hold with the Richmond Whig, that the recent political action of the present Congress is due to its own causes. That journal properly remarks:

"Whatever may be the true organization of the House, or the true causes of it, the fact is apparent on the very beginning of the session, and a reference to the votes for Speaker will show it. A House of Representatives, in its organization, in its progress of business, and in its legislation, is the people brought to the test. It is the people themselves, in their own persons, coming to Washington to do the business of the country. It is the people placed Gen. TAYLOR in the Presidential chair. Since that time, they have had an opportunity of doing anything, and they have done nothing. They have entered upon the business of legislation as they stood at the 4th of March, 1849, and no subsequent events under the sun have changed their relations to each other in point of political power. They either stand by the President's policy, or they do not. They either support the Administration, or they oppose it. They have had an opportunity of doing either, and they have done neither. They have left the whole matter in suspense. They have not even decided whether they will organize the House or not. They have not even taken the preliminary step of appointing a committee to wait upon the President and inform him that they are ready to receive any communication he may have to make to them. They have not even appointed a committee to wait upon the Senate and inform that body that they are ready to receive any communication it may have to make to them. They have not even appointed
