M. RITCHIE'S FAREWELL.

The Washington Union of the 18th inst., contains a long-valedictory address from Mr. Ritchie to his paper, and from the cares, interest and responsibilities of editorial life.

Like most of the productions of Mr. Ritchie, it is somewhat rambling and diffuse, but bears the marks of shrewdness, and of a ready and rapid pen. The writer, however, has not been able to avail himself of all the opportunities which his pen and his half-a-century's connection with the public press, makes a new profession of faith withdrawable from journalists and to professes advantage to his contemporaries. His pen, however, is not the only one which has been conspicuously decorated for the occasion and among the company adorned were some of the oldest and most devoted of Mr. Clay's friends. Of course there were many fine speeches made. Hon. WILLIS HALL presided at the Festival, and before the first fire was delivered, a speech was given by a young man upon the life and character of Mr. Clay. Joseph L. White, N. Bowditch Blount, George Connel, Gen. Mather and others also made brief addresses in response to the call of the President. The following, among other letters, were read:

Mr. Magnette's Telegraph.
