Bishop Donne's trial is still progessing slowly at Camden. Prelimenary matters have these far engaged the attenties of the Bench, and it has not yet been decided whether there is sufficient evidence in support of the presentment to justify holding the accessed to his defence. After a long disconsion the Court has permitted the Bishop to read a paper embodying the results of the diocessan lavestigation of these same charge. It is understood that Bishop Donne's next step (though contrary to the advice of his friends) will be to deny the acthority of the Court; he holds that he can be tried but once for the same uffence, and that since his Disconan Couvention has acquitted him, he is not amounted to the Bench of Bishops—oxcellent reasoning, if, according to Canous law, his Couvantion had any clearer new below the select of the desires new below the clearer new below.

Banch of Bishops—excellent reasoning, in an cording to Canon is w, his Couvention had any right to try him.
