THE BARKS AND THE MERCHASTS During the recent fluencial flurry it ment the contessed tata, it the banks contributed their share towards upholding the commercial community, by granting renewals in every instance where ultimate solveney was well ascertained, the merchants, on the other hand, sustained the banks with unexampled firmness, first by steadily resisting and opposing the latal policy of demanding cole for deposits, land, secondly by making tremendous efforts to curtail their obligations to these institutions. The banks are now secured beyond all pessibility from a recurrence of panic. They have gradually augmented their strength beyond any point intherito known. They hold in the aggregate in their vaulis one dollar and seventy cents in specie for every dollar in circulation, and have absolutely on band at this time is gold and silver inty three per cent. of all their liabilities.

But suppose the banks persist in calling in their deuts, and declining to furnish new accommodation, what du they gain? Nothing that we can perceive. It would be simply turning the series under and tighter on the merchants, with a view of testing the amount of pressure they might endure with all ying, way. We satisf that whe experiments would be dangerous abke for both parties. The merchants would, no doubt intimately furst, though experience has shown that those of our city can stand a shown that the same can be shown that the same can be shown that the same can be shown as a stand a shown that the same can be shown that the same can the beers just to the extent to which the former are their dectors. We sak then, is it not time for the banks to cease this system of centraction, and to recommence a course of reasonable liberality? We maintain not only that there is not that it is clearly to the interest of the banks to do so. Confidence is completely restored. There is not a single rational individual in or city but its absolutely continced of the impregiability of our banks, and perfectly aware that their issues and deposits are entirely sake.
