The London Tower and other European pour air are habitually addicted to the depreciation of a republican government, and the disperiagement of the political institutions of the United States. The most perfect water of national policy ever devised by man is human, and therefore subject to abuse, and liable to objection. We do not helieve a republican form of government infalible in itself; but we hold that it is far mere conformable to the demands of justice and right than any other. That it tends to make demagaques; that it large endowment of therety is apit to lead to license; that the purity of the principle which underlies it is sometimes polluted by corruption; that, in short, errors and evils are frequently manifold that the very existence of a republic does not arise so much from any inherent weakness in the system as from other causes, assily discovered by the reflecting mind. It is clear the control of the principle with live permanent and successful administration. It is, moreover, equally manifest that, as a rejublic is, from its very nature, far more complicated than adaptive and proposes to propose a medication, and administration. It is clear mough that the very existence of a republic resupposes the intelligence requisite for no thorough comprehension of the respon-tantly of self government.
