HOW TO MANAGE.

We confess with considerable pleasure that not a single Southern Senator undertook to reply to Mr. SUMNER'S elaborate diatribe against the Democracy. With the exception of the short, sharp and lightning rejoinder by Mr. CHESTNUT, of South Carolina, the chartered libeler was permitted to lead the air with his foul invective, and to give vent to the hoarded rancorousness of fourteen years of insanity, without a solitary effort from any of the Senators to interpose his dissent, or express his disbelief. This is as it should be. We have no sort of fear that SUMNER fancied he would stir up a commotion in the Senate greater than that encountered in Virginia by the rescue of JOHN BROWN, that the very moment the last phrase of his indignant harangue should fall from his lips, a dozen Southern members brimful of indignation and rage would start to their feet, pale with passion and trembling with secret dread, and one of them endeavored to prolong a discussion which would have been ingenuously fatal to SUMNER and his friends alone.

It has often struck us that much of the strength of respective slavery, which is perpetually finding out at Washington, might be subdued if the South would act with a little more decision and a little less violence. The representatives of the cotton States seem to go to Congress in a state of chronic and ready fear of treason, disunion, armed and ready for a treasonable blow-struck, and bluster, as blessings and distress, just as the man from the extreme North conceives it their duty to attack that institution with all the fractiousness they can command. If the former would make fewer speeches on the subject, the material possessed by the latter would be speedily exhausted. Nor do the latter would be speedily exhausted. Nor do the latter would be speedily exhausted. Nor do we know it is not pleasant for Southerners to hear such incomparable calumnies as the most renowned of their forefathers and their customs and institutions themselves and their customs and institutions themselves and their customs and institutions themselves
