NEW ORLEANS, MONDAY MORNING, JULY 20, 1863.

row of Bayou it was thought, would witness an extensive fight.

Our army, largely reinforced, had advanced into the Bayou, and the rebel force, without any resistance, was being driven back.

The Battle of the 19th.
While some of the New York papers say that Gen. Lee was not routed at Gettysburg, and give accounts of his army being still in the vicinity of that place, it is believed that the rebels have been driven back to the Potomac.

News to-day received from Washington, says that a portion of Lee's army, consisting of three or four divisions, were ordered to move on to the Potomac.

General Lee's army, probably for the purpose of watching our movements and gathering intelligence, has been ordered to move on to the Potomac.

Intelligence received by the late steamer from Europe confirms the statement in the Commercial Advertiser that there is no foundation for the report that Lee's army has been routed.

The published statement that the secession of the State of Virginia is a mere rumor, and that the State remains loyal to the Union.
