THE JURY SYSTEM.
The great English jurist, Lord Erskine, was so impressed by the jury system, that he is reported to have said, "I would give up all the honors and power which I possess, if I were not a juror." This was in the days when such trials were held only on capital offenses, and the jury was composed of the peers of the realm. It was not until the reign of George III. that the jury system was extended to civil cases, and the jury was then composed of the commonsense men of the county.
