We do not attribute the present torpor in our avenues of traft to the alleged unhealthiness of the climate, for there has not been in our recollection, which goes back a quarter of a century, a summer more marked by general exemption from disease than that through which we have just passed. Not would it be correct to charge our disappointment to the failure of crops, although these may not be an large as was expected. It is rather, we think, due to the fact that our factors and merchants have not yet made up their minds to accommodate themselves to the changed circumstants of the fact that our factors and merchants have not yet made up their minds to accommodate themselves to the changed circumstants and the surface and the surface and to enter this a close competition for the business which has hithests of them.
