

A VIEW OF BYRON.

William Dean Howells has to say of the poet.

How much wrong he did we should not now like to risk saying. We feel that it is not quite for us to say, though for whom it is to say is another matter.

His sin was largely a part of his pose, which was so largely a part of himself, and it must not be taken too seriously in making up a judgment of his character.

The truth is that Byron was always an aristocrat with very feudal principles and instincts, and though he gave his money and at last his life to the cause of Greek liberty, he died as distinctly for Byron as for Greece.

He was not a judge of men or books, and his rash and coarse estimate of Keats was of the same quality as his estimate of Hunt. The texture of his strenuous mind was loose and rough.

Then he and the governor monopolized the balance of the time before dinner. About the happiest man at that reunion was the old farmer from the Kickapoo valley.

When they reached home, the mother asked, "Nellie, what did the man say to you when I left you alone with him?"

"He said, 'You little rascal, or I'll thrash you.'"

DIDN'T FORGET HIM.

Uncle Jerry Rusk and the Farmer From the Kickapoo.

Major W. A. Curran of Wisconsin tells the following story to a writer for the Chicago Times-Herald: During Rusk's first term as governor he attended a reunion at Bos-cobol. I was on the outskirts of the audience while Uncle Jerry was making a speech.

"One winter night, pretty early in the fifties, I heard an ox driver loudly urging his team down by the crossing near our house. I was then living near Kickapoo. I said to my wife: 'I believe that's some poor fellow who's got stuck. I'll go and help him out.'"

"I took care of the cattle and he went into the house, and when I entered there he sat, a great, strapping fellow, before the big blaze in the old-fashioned fireplace, warming and drying himself. The first thing he said was: 'My friend, I believe I'm the happiest man in the United States this minute. I'm glad I accepted your invitation.'"

"Then he and the governor monopolized the balance of the time before dinner. About the happiest man at that reunion was the old farmer from the Kickapoo valley."

"You're a kind word," said the young woman who delights in amateur theatricals. "Why," replied the stage manager, "it goes without saying that you merit commendation."

"He said, 'You little rascal, or I'll thrash you.'"
