HYDE & GOODRICH, 15 Chartase at BANK OF LOUISLANA, to an the import of branch of commerce. We prodicity to this does need in compliance with the cit of its signers, who is goodle near of and not specialistic and rate ligence; but we do mit on ought not to rest our accurity on the adverse omens of the crop, which is now growing under the will and dispersation of providence, which has already suffered in many quarters from an intense drought, and in others from the ravages of the insects so destructive to its growth and maturity. We should look beyond the era of the short supply of the last year, and an approhended deficit during the coming season. The bassons of cosmonical wisdom belong to all seasons, and all these, and there is a salvatay truth in the homely aphorism, that those who do not take care of theoreties, are not likely to be taken sure of by others.—We therefore subsuit this call and invitation to you, with the earnest hope, that yeas will be prepared to cooperate with us a measure, it—which we believe the highest interests of our common country are involved. We believe that the steadiness in price, which would result from a portion, at least, of the cutton crop being example from the disastrous fluctuations arising from campalory asks, would, in the cut, be exarch tas valuable to the spinoer and consumer in England than to the grover and shipper here—a fact, which we think demonstra befrom the following postulates which we consider altogether self-evident:

I. The natural price of cotton is the effectfof the fair and natural influence of supply and demand.

The price cannot be steady, and the article cannot be current, so as to admit of safe calculations on the part of the planters, the manufacturer, and the merchant, unless the price be natural. It is consequently the interest of those three clacers, that the article-should be protected, on the one hand, from any great and under speculative action, which might interest of their side of the consequently the natural cancer, that the jyiii corner Commen and Tehenghtenha etc.
